Hugh Glass was a frontiersman, trapper, and explorer who lived in the early 19th century. He is best known for his incredible survival story, in which he survived a grizzly bear attack, crawled 200 miles through the wilderness, and lived to tell the tale.

Glass was born in Pennsylvania in 1783. He grew up in a frontier family, and learned to hunt and trap at a young age. In 1823, he joined a fur trapping expedition led by General William Ashley. The expedition was traveling through the Rocky Mountains when Glass was attacked by a grizzly bear.

The bear mauled Glass's face and neck, and tore open his back. The other members of the expedition thought that Glass was dead, and they left him behind. However, Glass was still alive. He crawled 200 miles through the wilderness, eating berries and roots, and drinking water from streams.

After six weeks, Glass reached Fort Kiowa, a trading post on the Missouri River. He was greeted as a hero, and his story was quickly spread throughout the country. Glass's survival story is a testament to the human spirit. It is a story of courage, determination, and resilience.

The Grizzly Bear Attack

They drove the bear away, but they thought that Glass was dead. They left him behind and continued on their journey.
